

Did you know that studying animals can teach us a lot about our own bodies? Many animals have similar organs and systems to humans, and by studying how they work, we can learn more about ourselves. For example, studying the wings of birds has helped us develop airplanes, and studying the eyes of insects has helped us improve our cameras.