

Rockets have different stages that are used during launch. Each stage contains its own fuel and engines, and when the fuel is used up, that stage is dropped off and the next stage takes over. This allows the rocket to become lighter and go faster as it travels higher into space.