

The Kakapo is a flightless, nocturnal parrot native to New Zealand. It is a very rare and endangered species, with only around 200 left in the world. The Kakapo is also the heaviest parrot in the world, with some individuals weighing up to 4 kilograms! They are known for their distinctive sweet, musty smell and their ability to climb trees using their strong feet and claws. Unlike most birds, Kakapos are herbivores, and their diet mainly consists of leaves, bark, and fruits.

They are also known for their unusual mating behavior, where males gather in special areas and make loud booming calls to attract females. Kakapos are very important to New Zealand's ecology and conservation efforts, and many organizations are working to protect and save this unique and fascinating species.
