

The Leopard Seal is a type of seal that can be found in the waters around Antarctica and occasionally near New Zealand. These large and powerful animals have long, sleek bodies and distinctive spots on their fur, which is where they get their name from.

Leopard seals are known for being quite vocal, and they use a variety of sounds to communicate with each other. While they primarily eat fish, they are also known to hunt penguins and other seals. Despite their fearsome reputation, Leopard Seals are curious and intelligent animals that are fascinating to watch, but it's important to give them plenty of space and respect their wild nature.