

Sally was so shy she rarely spoke. She saw some of her classmates talking and laughing, but she stayed silent. She should speak up, she thought, but the words seemed stuck in her throat. So Sally slowly started to say a few words here and there, and soon enough she was joining in conversations with her friends. With each word spoken, Sally felt more accepted and confident.